

Title / Subject Line: Why The Odds Are Against People With Migraine

In the United States, there is less than one headache specialist for every 60,000 people living with headache or migraine disease. This figure is similar or worse in many other countries.

For most of us, this critical shortage of headache specialists means we're working to manage our disease with someone who doesn't specialize in headache or migraine—usually it's our family doctor or a general neurologist.

But here's the problem. On average, a family doctor or general practitioner has completed just four hours of head pain instruction during their medical training.

The World Health Organization published this figure in its Atlas of Headache Disorders report. You've probably spent more than four hours in your doctor's waiting room! The report also found that migraine is underdiagnosed, undertreated, and poorly managed.

Some people consult a neurologist, but neurologists aren't necessarily headache specialists unless they focus specifically on headache disorders. Many neurologists practice general neurology or specialize in other areas such as spinal cord disorders or Alzheimer's. Migraine and headache could be just a fraction of the cases they see.

The shortage of headache specialists is nothing less than a crisis for those of us living with migraine, and the numbers aren't getting significantly better anytime soon.

That's why we want you to know about the Migraine World Summit. The Migraine World Summit is the world's largest online event for people who want to learn about the latest treatments, research, and proven strategies to prevent and treat migraine. This year's Migraine World Summit is from March 6-13.

It's a free, online event that features 32 global experts from leading institutions including the National Institutes of Health, Mayo Clinic, and Harvard Medical School.

In a perfect world, we'd all have the opportunity to work with a headache specialist. But until then, the Migraine World Summit informs about migraine and headache so you can be a self-advocate and work with your healthcare professionals to manage your disease better.

Get free access when you register today.

Register now at:

[insert your affiliate link]

Please note: This message contains an affiliate link. The event is free to watch live. If you decide to purchase a copy of the interviews, we may receive a portion of the proceeds to help us continue our important work.